the amount of money that a bank has is a variable that can vary substantially, depending on the size of the bank or the quality of the activities it carries out.

Factors that influence the amount of money a bank has are:

- Bank size: Larger banks have more investments, but smaller banks have more work and new resources.
- Bank type: Commercial banks, such as those that buy and sell digital assets, generally have more money in reserves for financial purposes.
- Volume of business: Banks that maintain a high volume of investments have higher financial reserves.

So, the financial investment, for example, has conditions that are both operational and final.
